Andrea Coombes, a Labour MP, is one of them. Ms Coombes is paid £69,914, including benefits, for a 40-hour week. The MP, who shares with her husband a constituency office, three staff and a flat in their beautiful home town of Islington, N3, wants to see that rise to £90,000. Is Ms Coombes the only Labour MP raising a request like this? In 2010, she claims to be one of a small number of MPs who had made a formal request for an increase in pay. A “high level of discussion” on the issue has taken place at the highest level of the party. The immediate concern is that under-paid MPs keep the expenses receipts to fund the modest expenses of their constituencies, but if that means fewer people in parliament earning more than £1m a year the loss of low-paid members of the public who have provided the housing and tax income to pay for the highest-paid MPs must be an issue for Labour. The view of Keir Starmer, Labour's shadow Brexit secretary, is that an increase in the wage is "a matter for the leader's policy". But he is also bound to be mindful of the "dignity of our people". "We have to have a great deal of sympathy

A species goes extinct. How do you know? You know when it’s not there anymore. Humans, the measure of all things, will have a pretty good idea when a species stops being there. It will be the moment when there’s no more poop. The beaver pond without a tail. The halibut without a fin. It will also be the moment when the earth stops knowing that it had a species. We will look around and say “well, there was that one and now there’s none left.” But how do you know that the earth didn’t have a species? After all, there are still a lot of animals and plants in the world. What if the earth had a species, but we just didn’t know about it? We have no idea how many animals there are. We just don’t know. Many biologists believe that there are about 400,000 species living today (the number is constantly changing). But when you have so many species, some are going to 6d1f23a050
